Dear Mr. Haefeli,

I love your work and look forward every week to seeing what you will share with us New Yorker readers. My absolute favorite is the one of the Little League coach at the very moment of realizing, with annoyance, that Pirates and Carjackers are morally equivalent.

While that praise is sincere and deserved, I'm really just buttering you up prior to making the following suggestion slash request. I'm sure you have plenty of ideas but I thought you might consider this: I would LOVE to see your rendering of an angry woman scraping the dad of the stick figure family from the back window of her SUV. No one conveys irritation better than you do!

In case there might be legal scruples, I hereby grant to you, William Haefeli, any and all rights to use the preceding idea in any way you choose and relinquish all rights to same.

Thank you for your time, talent and humor and a blessing upon you during the holidays and the into the year beyond.

Yours sincerely,
